In this issue we have two articles by our members: Judging the German Shepherd Dog by Ginny Altman and Anxiety in Dogs by Judy Grumdahl and a new column by Sheila Metz. I hope we can get some more great articles from our membership.

We have the Potluck coming up Dec. 11, remember to bring a dish of your choice. We will have Santa photos again so bring your canine friends for pictures. If you have trees or decorations that will help the scene for the photos, bring them along too. Joelle Hymel is the contact for the potluck and Cindy Muehlbauer has volunteered to take on the silent auction. The proceeds from the auction will go to Second Harvest for pet food. Cindy has listed some potential items for the auction on page 10.

We are starting a new year, the banquet is coming up January 23 at Gulden's. There is a registration form on page 11. Linda Salava is handling this once again. There will be fabulous door prizes and lots of fun!

Mada Parnell has offered to take over the Regional Challenge, so send any new titles or other information to Mada. Her contact information is on the left side of this page.

It is time to volunteer to run for office. So please contact Cindy Muehlbauer, Paul Johnson, or Ginny Altman, to express your interest. We also need a secretary and show chair for our specialties. There are many opportunities coming up to volunteer and become more involved in the club activities. Working on the various committees and projects is a fun way to meet other people with similar interests. We welcome new faces to our activities. If you have a question speak to a board member. The officers and board members are listed on the left side of this page.

I am sure we will have another herding fun day or two in the spring and another herding trial. We have many events to look forward to.

It is time to submit your recommendations for the Don Cliff Sportsmanship Award. Please send your write ups to Mike Metz.

Julie Swinland.

Judging the German Shepherd Dog

by Ginny Altman - Reprinted with permission From the author and Showsight magazine

So you want to judge the German Shepherd Dog! If you are new to the breed, you have your work cut out for you to learn the nuances of the breed! The dog was bred in the late 1800's for its working ability and as a herding dog. The German Shepherd Dog is quite unlike any other breed in that a good specimen moves with a flying trot which is an effortless, ground covering, suspended gait. I will elaborate on that after I address temperament.

As a working dog, in service to mankind, the German Shepherd Dog must have sound temperament.

The dog is expected to be aloof to strangers with a quiet, confident, stand your ground attitude or even ignoring your presence. Some dogs may be a bit curious, even friendly, and want to "check you out" but, in judging the German Shepherd Dog, a dog that shows apprehension or avoidance to your approach or tucks its tail in fear should not be rewarded under any circumstances. Evaluating the dog for sound temperament is primary!

There is a wide range of responses given by a dog with suitable temperament. These can be simple curiosity, a willingness to greet the judge or approaching the judge, as the judge is making their approach, to sniff or lick the hand. I don't mind if the dog just "ducks" his head. A dog may just give an acknowledgment that the judge is there without making overtures, or the dog may sniff the ground or otherwise ignore the judge, these are among many examples too numerous to mention. Further attempts by the judge to elicit responses such as grabbing the head, taking the leash, or making other overtures toward the dog are unwarranted and are discouraged. If a judge questions the temperament of the dog, that is sufficient to withhold any award.

A word on puppies: I recommend that you approach puppies from the side, with a friendly verbal greeting and a hand pat on the side or under the fore-chest rather than coming straight at the puppy and trying to pat it on top of the head. Puppies may not have the confidence that an adult dog is expected to display. In any case, if it is not going well and the puppy is actively avoiding you, just back off--do not push it—there is no point in giving the puppy a bad experience, it might just be that it is the dog's first time in the ring or away from its owner.

GSD Breeder Judges are expected to comply with a specific temperament test that has been defined by the GSDCA, Inc. which calls for the judge to 1) have the dog stand in a specifically designated location in the ring, 2) request that the dog not be given any commands inside or distractions from outside the ring, 3) that the dog be on a loose lead and that the judge, 4) before any other hands-on contact with the dog is made, 5) approach the dog from at least six feet away. Upon reaching the dog, the judge 6) gives a friendly pat on the side of the dog and completes the temperament evaluation based on the dog's response. This defined procedure is not expected of the judge who has not become intimately familiar with the German Shepherd Dog. If you have not participated in a "hands on" one-on-one instruction of that technique and become comfortable with it, do not try to carry it out based on a written description, viewing a video, or observing someone else doing that specific evaluation. That said, you must still evaluate the temperament. To do so, you would observe the dog as you approach it on your initial hands on contact, perhaps during the individual examination.

I always let the dog know I am approaching by talking to it as I approach the dog obliquely in a "matter-of –fact” manner, without making direct eye contact (direct eye contact might be interpreted by the dog as aggression), and giving it a friendly pat on the body behind the wither.

If a mature dog, backs away behind the handler, tries to avoid you or otherwise seems to you to be unsure of itself, do not reward it; that is not the temperament we are looking for in German Shepherd Dogs. A German Shepherd Dog must, first of all, have a sound temperament.

As a herding dog, the German Shepherd Dog is expected to have a ground covering gait that will efficiently carry it tirelessly as a “moving fence” around the flock. In a ring of adequate size, a dog moving on a loose lead can demonstrate the flying-trot for which the German Shepherd Dog is known. Even in a ring that is not as large as one would like, a pleasing forehand reach, a strong level back, under-drive from the hind quarter balancing that of the fore hand, and good follow-through in the rear should be evident. This can only be achieved if the dog is moving slowly enough to be moving on a loose lead and showing that easy balanced gait that is so beautiful to watch.

Your biggest challenge will be to convince yourself that it is possible to get to see the dog moving slowly enough to see the dog on a loose lead. I am never satisfied to see the dog on a loose lead for only a brief few seconds. I want to see the dog moving consistently on a loose lead. It is not uncommon for me to send the dogs around as a class more than once, so that I do get to see all of the dogs on a loose lead. It is the dog that moves effortlessly, with an outreaching fore-hand, balanced front and rear, a firm back and good follow-through that I am looking for. It is impossible to see this in the same way when the dog is leaning into the collar on a tight lead. Not only will the front action and extension seem exaggerated on a tight lead, but the dog can give the appearance of “lifting.” Also, on a tight lead you may see the rear toes drag on the mat on the forward motion of the hindquarter while giving an impression of “drive from the rear”.

When the class comes into the ring, I typically will have the dogs in catalog order and stacked for an overview of the class. Then I will instruct the handlers to take them around “slow and easy and on a loose lead”. I may repeat those instructions and wave them on around a second time, if I have not gotten compliance on the first round. I do, on occasion, stop the handlers and ask them to “walk”. I then, am looking for the dog that displays a good walking front extension balanced with good hindquarter motion. A good back is important and it is not possible to properly evaluate the strength of the back in motion while the dog is on a tight lead. If in the end, I fail to get compliance with my request for a loose lead, I may find I need to evaluate the strength of the back on the individual exam.

The structure of the German Shepherd Dog is best evaluated in motion. The individual exam is minimal hands-on. Observe for temperament on your approach on the individual if you have not already evaluated temperament. On my approach, I look, in general, at the secondary sex characteristics and do not make direct eye contact with the dog as that can be interpreted as a challenge to the dog. The GSD is not a head breed but it is pleasing if the secondary sex characteristics are pronounced, the eyes are dark and almond shaped and the ears are well-placed but these attributes are secondary to gait. The individual exam consists of checking for a scissors bite, full dentition, shoulder layback, observing the length of upper arm, depth of chest and length of loin, slope of the croup and, in the case of males, checking for testicles.

This individual exam is done in one continuous motion, without taking hands off the dog until the exam is complete. The hands-on confirms (or perhaps disproves) what the eye can see.

The German Shepherd Dog is a well angulated dog, but that does not mean that there should be extreme departure from sound motion coming and going. The gait training of the dog predisposes the dog to wanting to “move out” often resulting in the dog scrambling or pulling to the side on the down and back. I will move the dogs on the diagonal, giving the handler a greater distance with which to work. Occasionally, I have had to send the dog around with the purpose of observing the going and coming from that perspective. Most GSD are sound “coming at you” and deviation from that is generally not tolerated. Some GSD have a laxity in hock movement accompanied by an irregular movement over the croup and over-angulated rears. On occasion you may see the tail bouncing off the hock- take a second look in these instances- we do have some “dead tails” in our breed which point to neurological problems which lead to an inability to lift the tail. These dogs will not have the “saber” tail described in the standard but a tail that “hangs.” The standard does not define this as a fault but it is not normal and may point to a health problem.

Over-angulation and laxity in the rear can be such that some animals are unable to clear their toes on the forward motion of the rear-quarter (toe-dragging). There can also be cow-hock action which may be accompanied by a lack of follow-through or inability of the hock joint to open (locked hocks). These faults may not be easily seen if the dog is moving at high speeds and on a tight lead. The German Shepherd Dogs that I am looking to see, display strong, well-muscled, harmonious angulation, front and rear, while moving with feet close to the ground and with a reasonably clean rear action when “going away”.

A description of judging the German Shepherd Dog is not complete without imparting an emphasis to understanding the importance of side gait. The flying trot is a suspended gait in which, during the gaiting sequence, all four feet are off the ground and the momentum of the rear thrust carries the dog forward to a ground covering, outreaching front. The outreaching front paw, close to the ground, extends beyond the nose of the dog. The power comes from the well-muscled thigh and good follow through in the hock; the dog uses his hind quarter to reach under, overreaching the front which is now under the dog, and effortlessly delivers a thrust that transmits through the strong back and carries the dog forward in a suspended ground covering gait. This can be viewed in a well done video clip produced in Germany and narrated in the German language. Note that in this video, the dog is not on lead and the head is carried in a more forward than upright position. The movement speaks for itself and it is certainly not necessary to understand the narrative to get the value from watching it. <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=TIFpKL0qRQ0>

Also, take the opportunity to observe the German Shepherd Dog at some specialty shows where there is likely to be a large ring and extended gaiting of the dog. Herding trials are also a good place to watch the natural gait of the German Shepherd Dog. It is also exciting to see these dogs work the livestock in their confident and responsive manner.

In a small ring it may not be easy to see the flying trot except in the best of specimens and where the dog has been accustomed to a slower movement in a small ring on a loose lead. The dog that can suspend and demonstrate the flying trot at a slow speed is a mighty fine dog indeed!! The best that can be done in judging in situations where a large ring is not available is to see the dogs going slowly and on a loose lead. The dog that moves effortlessly and with the least amount of steps will certainly catch your eye over the dog that is moving rapidly, working hard at it but not covering as much ground.

In the end, after the individual gaiting is completed, I will take a class of six or eight dogs to be evaluated comparatively for side gait after having eliminated those with faults of temperament and considering the importance of any other strengths or faults that were observed. Again, insisting on a slow easy gait and consistently gaiting on a loose lead, the reach, balance, strength of back, ease of movement and elastic, ground covering ability can be evaluated.

It is in this final distillation that the final judgment rests upon the side-gait as seen on this day in the ring and proper importance is given to that gait when judging the German Shepherd Dog.

ANXIETY IN DOGS

an original article by Judy Grumdahl

We have all experienced it. Even the most mellow, trained dogs can have episodes of anxiety at some time in their lives. So what exactly is anxiety? Anxiety can be defined as a state of mind – a sense of apprehension and fear often marked by physical symptoms (such as trembling, panting, tension, lifting of front paw or paws, jumping, and increased heart rate). This state of mind is a source of energy. And that energy is what powers the symptoms as the energy must go somewhere, it must have an outlet

How does one deal with anxiety properly? First, let's review the multiple ways that anxiety has been dealt with ineffectively to better understand what not to do.

1. "Coo-Cooing" or coddling our dogs using body language and sweet talk. We inadvertently "feed" the anxiety and fear. Coddling is actually coaxing or asking your dog not to stress. Mentally that tells us (and the dog!) that we are unsure of how to bring you out of the stress. That hesitation and lack of confidence is what accelerates the fear and anxiety.
2. Harsh corrections either by voice or physical correction. This just creates more anxiety and thus more symptoms. Any corrections needed must be firm and fair and most of all calm.
3. Ignoring the dog's anxiety and holding the dog tightly in restraint. Physical tension equals mental tension. And the cycle goes on and on.

Now, let's look at the positive, effective ways to deal with a dog's anxiety.

1. Give the dog an outlet to release the negative energy. Pace out or walk your dog to give them a task to focus on. Just as they pace out race horses or we, as humans, pace the floor...same concept, give the energy an outlet!
2. Give the dog a specific direction or option they can comprehend. Commands such as sit or lie down or certain obedience exercises which can be made into fun games can help aid in releasing the dog's anxiety. They understand it, and can do it. Take the pressure off by giving them something they CAN do and releasing that energy into something productive and positive.
3. Place yourself in a calm, assertive state of mind and allow that energy to flow down to your dog. Most have heard how we are connected to the dog and the leash becomes an electrical power cord connecting us to the dog, right? Well that is true in a sense...but it is not just that leash. The energy that our states of mind exert can be felt in an entire room! Dogs are very sensitive to this. So, it is extremely important that we distress ourselves before we can distress our dogs!

Another question may be, what can be done on a regular routine basis in advance to enable a dog to cope with anxiety and stress in a better manner? Here are some options.

1. Prior to any potentially stressful or anxiety causing event, make sure your dog has been exercised. Then, go into it calmly and be prepared to de-stress your dog if need be.
2. Desensitize your dog to stressful events or areas of life. For example, bring them into crowded, chaotic situations on a regular basis, but with NO OTHER GOAL IN MIND other than to let the dog get used to these surroundings. Do this and then you can start working on obedience or conformation, etc. when the dog gets over the initial anxiety issues.
3. Make sure that as your dog's leader you go into each situation calm and assertive to enable you and your dog to be less stressed and anxious. This reduces the risk of a vicious cycle of anxiety between you and your beloved pet. Remember, if you stress the odds are high that your dog will stress! This is the most important step of all!

We all go into it with fun calm attitudes. But most of all we all train for situations like this all the time.

Southern Dixie Ear Cleaner

*Disclaimer, speak to your vet if you are unsure what's going on in the ear

We German Shepherd owners are familiar with the head shaking, sticky brown material in our puppies and dogs ears. While there are many good products for ear cleaners on the market, we have used this home-made formula for several years. Should you suspect a bacterial infection, it is imperative you see your vet. This recipe is cheap and plentiful.

16ounces isopropyl alcohol (if ears are scraped or sore use witch hazel instead)

Mix four Tablespoons of Boric acid into the bottle (ask pharmacist--it is kept behind the counter)

16 drops of gentian violet (also behind pharmacists counter)

Mix well and shake before each use

We use an eye dropper. Massage a dropper full in each ear and massage.

2x daily for two weeks

1x daily for two more weeks

1x a month thereafter

Warning: The boric acid and gentian violet are poison. keep away from children or pets. In addition, the gen. violet stains very badly. Do the head shaking where they won't ruin your good furniture or wall coverings. This recipe will last a person with 10 dogs about two years and total about $12.

Some breeders believe the yeast infections to have a genetic This may be true as Proven Hill's Jock Hoheneichen passed this on. Many of our dogs go back to Jock. His owner referred to this ailment as, what else, jock itch.

Less common is stuff that looks like coffee grounds in their ears. a magnifying glass and putting it on white paper will reveal what it is==ear mites. Use an ear mitacide as directed.

Should you not see improvement after second or third day, puppy should be checked out for secondary bacterial infection.

The treatment is especially good in summer for dogs who love to swim. The boric acid soothes the ear, it dries the ear and gentian violet destroys the yeast. Diet changes for the dog with constant bad ears may be an answer, as are clean chips in igloos and super clean bedding materials. Never use a Q tip to clean dog ears. Do not tape a puppy's ears if a yeast infection is in progress. Ears should be checked at every grooming time, as well as teeth or any changes on the body.

This recipe is also good for yeast between the toes, although it must be absorbed and dried. When in doubt, call your breeder.

Best wishes, Sheila Metz, Lindenhill German Shepherd Dogs
