Carol Ouhl lost her faithful companion Ark this month. You may remember him from his demos at the State Fair. Carol has written a tribute to Ark that starts on page 3.

We have had quite the spring. Do you think the snow has finally stopped? I just heard tonight that we may have some more snow in a few days.

The last few snows led to extreme mud at Phyllis Clark's and we had to cancel the Herding Fun Day which would have been today. It looked great Saturday when I was out there but I guess more melting occurred and made the situation unsafe for beginning dogs. She wrote to me this evening and said it poured out there today so it is a good thing we called it off. We are looking at rescheduling on June 30.

We have our specialty shows coming up June 22-23. That includes conformation, obedience and rally. It's time to get your dogs ready for those classes, bring them down to training and work on their and your skills.

I found several interesting articles by Susan Chaney and have one in this issue, First Three Months Strategic to Preventing Hip Dysplasia.

The plans are coming along for the German Shepherd Dog Fun Day on July 27 at Kubistraum. Dr. LaVallie is coming at noon for chiropractic, there is T-Touch, the CGC test, Bobby is planning the low cost veterinary services again, and we will have tracking, agility, and NoseWork. There will be a temperament test I am working on a few other things too. A canine portrait artist just confirmed that she will be there, so bring photos for her to work from if you are interested in having a portrait created of your dog (s).

Please look over the opportunities to volunteer on page 10. It is a big club and we should be able to cover all the jobs necessary. The board can't do everything, nor should they have to. Volunteering is a great way to meet people in the club and learn new things. Newer members in the club, please feel free to ask the old timers to mentor you on various volunteer opportunities.

Is anyone interested in a geocaching day? We had a lot of fun the two times we held one. You get a chance to get out with your dog and see a beautiful State Park and go on a sort of treasure hunt in the woods looking for "caches" that have been hidden at certain coordinates. We do this at State Parks because they have GPS's that they loan for free. I just checked, and Afton State Park has a new 3 part multicache - there are 2 clues to find before you reach the cache. We always have a pot luck picnic after we make our find.

RIP Ark, aka Arky-Barky, aka wild and crazy guy

By Carol Ouhl

First of all, thank you to the Club for the sympathy card. It always helps to know others understand the emotions of losing our 4 legged friends. Every one of us who has lost a dog (or many over the years) knows that every one of them has a special personality, a special place in our heart for many reasons. In my case I always seem to have a stronger bond with those dogs who do therapy dog work with me even more than the ones who have won the ribbons and trophies or been on TV or whatever. And so - I write this article not so much in tribute to Ark but in the hopes I might help at least one other GSD owner to be more aware – more alert to our dogs' changing health. I'm not one to ignore those changes but as it turns out, I can be fooled by what I think is the obvious.

Ark came to me at 10 months; a cute puppy, from our K9 cop club member who knew he'd never "make the grade". You may have heard me comment that I was told "he couldn't be made to bite", and I thought that was a pretty good problem to have for a person who does mostly therapy dog work and public demos with her GSDs.

Ark and Carol Ouhl dancing at our State Fair Demo

Ark in a witch's hat

As he grew up, he was very challenging to train due to his high drive. It is that high drive that would come to be both a wonderful trait and a problem. He helped me learn a lot about channeling energy to productive uses. After 2 super calm, couch potato dogs, it was fun not to have to figure out a new way to motivate a dog. He was always wound up. But by the age of two I realized I had a lot of work to do in teaching him to stop correctly. He stopped (always from a dead run) by jamming his front feet into the ground and letting his body and hind feet slide up to hit his front feet. I have a video of him at a show doing a fantastic sliding stop on a recall that would have been the envy of any cutting or reining horse. As a result, he tore his ACL at age 3; not an unexpected outcome given his sliding stops. His knee was never the same; but if there was a ball or a Frisbee to chase, he'd chase it. Even if he was on an obedience stay until released to "fetch it", once released he'd shoot after it and fly over the jump as if released from a sling shot. He was always up for whatever new adventure we had. Whether it was calmly greeting Llamas at a therapy animal test when he'd never seen a Llama or dancing with me at the Fair.

So the years passed and he began to do the old dog limping on and off, getting stiff. I'm still sure he'll live to 13 or 14 due to his high energy; his bright, happy, playful as a 2 yr old behavior. Then the Vet diagnosed Degenerative Joint Disease –basically arthritis in every joint. Probably poor breeding; definitely poorer conformation. He was a very square dog with perfect hips, but his stifles (knees) were a train wreck. So we began to give him various types of pain medications some of which worked; some not. As the stiffness and limping increased, we'd increase the pain meds. And still a very bright and playful pup. Well I've given you all this seemingly unnecessary detail to give you an idea of how easily we assume we know what's going on. Fast forward to age 11. He's starting to get weak when trying to climb up into a chair. He's limping considerably on the leg with the bad knee. He's intermittently limping on other legs. But he's still slamming after any ball that anyone will throw or kick for him. Then one day he's jumping up on my bed and just whacks his carpus (front wrist) on the wooden edge of the bed. Not a yelp, of course. But couldn't put weight on the leg. I give him more pain meds and crate him for 3 days and he's fine. Then he's worse; then he's better. The swelling goes away and comes back again. Goes away; comes back. He's still practicing retrieves over a high jump (a very low one of course) as jumping is also one of his favorite things to do. He's still doing therapy dog demos. Not a hint he doesn't feel well.

After a week of swelling and no swelling, we head to the vet sure that there must be a fracture somewhere. He's lying on the floor when the vet walks in, looks down at his leg, listens to history of events and starts talking about tumors. My mind couldn't catch up.

"What? Why are we talking about tumors? I came for an x-ray." They take the x-ray – bad news. No it's not broken. It's bone cancer. The tumor had eaten through the bone (hence the swelling on his wrist). He's had it for some time and it's spread quite a bit (hence the continually increasing limping in various legs). Prognosis was 3 months at best with a LOT of pain in the meantime. And so he was euthanized. The vet techs who saw the x-ray couldn't believe he walked into the clinic normal as ever. He should have needed to be carried or been hopping on 3 legs.

Looking back it's hard not to feel guilty. Knowing what high drive he had, why did I assume it was just old age arthritis rather than him working through the pain. Could the vet have diagnosed the cancer earlier? She doesn't know but there were other signs. Losing weight which I attributed to old age and continued high activity. The limping on and off in different legs (Lymes was not a high probability for him) and I already knew he had arthritis. So the moral of this story in my mind is – when things seem to be getting a little unusual, don't assume you know what's going on. Keep track of those seemingly minor, unusual things and see the vet. No, the outcome would not have been different in his case. But he wouldn't have had to endure the pain so long.

Home Made Kong Fillings

How-to: Mix ingredients in a bowl and fill up your Kong. Insert a chew-toy and place filling around it, if you want to further engage your dog. Serve fresh, refrigerated, or frozen!

Results may vary, based on the amount of each ingredient and the size of Kong(s). *Some dogs are lactose intolerant, so be sure to check with your vet before serving your dog dairy.

First Three Months Strategic to Preventing Hip Dysplasia

By Susan Chaney

Breeders may be able to do even more about preventing dysplasia in their litters than previously known.

While genes set up the possibility of hip dysplasia, studies have pointed to weight and rapid growth as triggers for its development. Now, new research indicates that the environment during a puppy's first three months of life may have more effect on its risk for developing the condition.

Randi I. Krontveit, D.V.M., Ph.D., spent 10 years doing canine dysplasia research for her doctoral thesis.

"I had been working as a clinician for quite a few years when this study was started at the Norwegian School of Veterinary Science, and I applied for this Ph.D. position. It was a great opportunity for me to do research."

To find dogs for the study, the project leaders, her colleagues at the vet school and the Norwegian Kennel Club "all played an important role in recruitment of dog breeders," Krontveit explains. "These breeders again recruited dog owners by getting their puppy buyers interested and committed to this project."

She studied five hundred privately owned Newfoundland, Labrador Retriever, Leonberger and Irish Wolfhound puppies in Norway, from birth through age 10. Breeders and owners purchasing puppies filled out questionnaires about the puppies' activities, growth and health. The puppies were also examined by veterinary surgeons and their hips X-rayed at ages determined by the kennel club – 12 or 18 months depending on breed.

Krontveit's research may dispute previous research, as she found that the breed that grows the slowest, the Newfie, had the highest incidence of dysplasia at 36 percent. The Wolfhound, which grows the quickest, had the lowest risk of disease at 10 percent. These results surprised Krontveit and her fellow researchers, she says.

A 10-year Norwegian study discovered that puppies that go up and down stairs before the age of 3 months are more likely to develop hip dysplasia. Photo by Gheorghiescu Alexandru/Dreamstime.com

Her research also indicates that conditions at a breeder's kennel or home have a bigger effect on the development of dysplasia in the future. Puppies born in spring or summer had a lower risk, as did those who had a chance to exercise in a park on a daily basis until 3 months of age. Those who walked up and down steps during the first three months had an increased risk of developing hip dysplasia. "Overall, it would appear that daily exercise out in gently undulating terrain up until the age of 3 months gives a good prognosis when it comes to preventing HD," Krontveit concludes.

Owners filled out annual questionnaires so Krontveit could track the dogs' health. In reviewing the effect of HD on the dogs, she found that Newfoundlands and Leonbergers seriously affected by dysplasia were euthanized sooner than Labrador Retrievers or Irish Wolfhounds. Symptoms, such as limping and hip pain, developed earliest in Newfoundlands and latest in Labs. The research also found that "varied exercise had a positive effect, and dogs that exercised on a daily basis on a lead and running free in different types of terrain were free of symptoms longer than dogs that were less active."

Despite the fact that her findings are different from those of others who have researched hip dysplasia, she says that most of the response she's gotten has been "very enthusiastic" and that other researchers are "very interested" in her research. "So far I have not gotten any negative responses," she says.

Krontveit points out that the results of the study are not "definitive," and "further studies on hip dysplasia etiology are certainly needed. Perhaps the most important finding of my research is that the period from birth until 3 months seems crucial, and further studies including this time period would be beneficial. Having said that, it might not be possible or necessary to find 'all' factors critical for hip dysplasia development. It would be good if results from research could be used to modify environment for young puppies and thus perhaps prevent disease."

No one else is doing similar research at this time, to the best of Krontveit's knowledge.

GSD FUN DAY! - July 27 At Verna's Kubistraum

Try new things, have fun, pot luck!

We will have chiropractor, Dr Mark LaVallie, T-touch with Deb Merton, Tracking, obedience, rally, agility, a temperament test and CGC test, low cost shots and micro chipping, animal communicator, Masseuse, and NoseWork among other things. And there will be food!

We need volunteers.

After 2 years Ann Jeddelloh wants to retire from the Check in desk on Friday nights. Contact Conni Sokolouski and volunteer for 1 month at a time or as much as you can. Remember that you get one free lesson for every night you work the desk.

Overall coordinator and food people for the Specialty shows June 22-23. We have food at our specialties and we ask the members to bring food and one member or a team prepare the main course for each day and set up and collect payment for the meal. I believe that Laurie Schray will take one day and she can give advice for the people who take over the other day. She can use help on her day too. An overall coordinator would be helpful so we know that there are enough plates, etc for the second day.

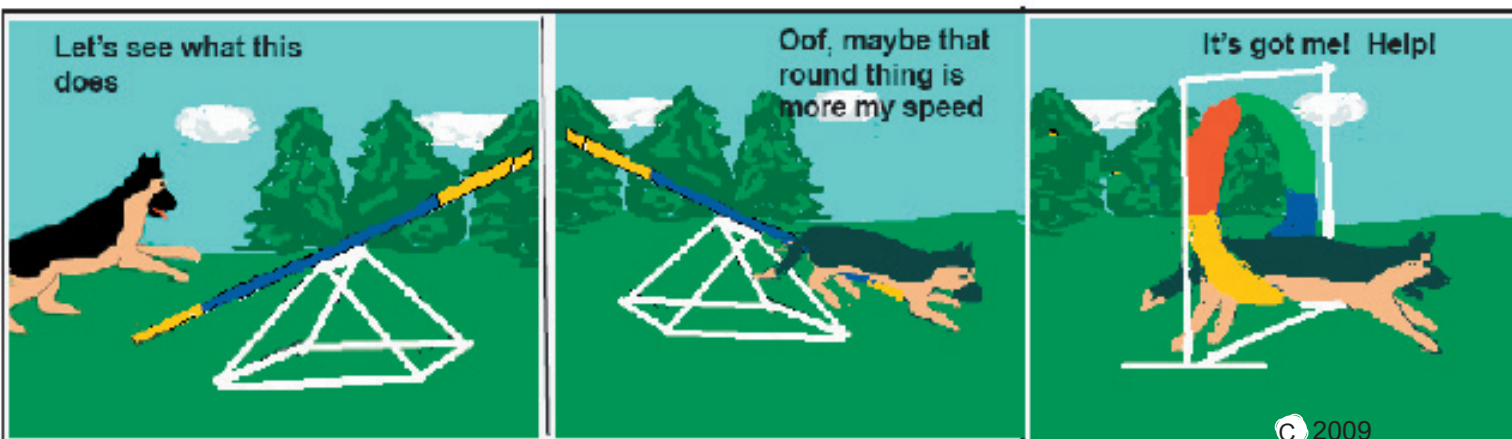

Other positions at the specialty shows, Contact Bobby Moore. We always need people to help set up and watch over the grounds, bring the club trailer to the show and back to the Animal Inn, to help roll out the mats for obedience and later to roll them up etc. Also we need obedience and rally stewards and conformation stewards. These people check entrants in set up obedience equipment, act as posts for the figure 8 exercises etc. People will tell you what to do.

Also for the specialty shows we would like someone to take on the raffle. Kathi Balaban did an outstanding job last year and maybe she will volunteer again, but she may need help gathering items to place in the raffle, selling tickets, and watching over the table.

State Fair Coordinator Contact Conni Sokolouski. The coordinator makes sure that there is a person in charge of each area, conformation, obedience, agility, etc and sets up times for the demos, makes sure that we have all the handouts that are needed and that someone will be there to answer questions.

Someone to haul the club trailer to Verna's for the GSD Fun Day prior to July 27 and back to the Animal Inn Contact Julie Swinland
